"Long hair is out of style," was the statement made by Hermann Carlin, who wrote Betty L., one of the most prominent of the "Little Rose Hairdressers." A C. A. meeting Tuesday. They both emphasized the point that either either or long hair or bob is more practical for the social season. The former is probably more practical for the social season.

Professors Discuss

Winchell's Effect

On Everyday Speech

"Wooops," "pap," "sexist," or other New York speech words, according to the Walter Winchell variety, have been taken up by different and often new vocabularies, and will make a very considerable impression on the language, according to a group of college professor.

Opinions varied from that of Professor H. W. Ward of the College of Iowa, who thought "Winchell" race phrases and often etymologically new coinages would make a very considerable impression on the language, according to the independent judge of Professor J. W. Rankin of the University of Missouri, who concluded that "Winchell" is 200.

Other English professors, on the other hand, who did not concede that Winchell would affect the language, contained a rather good effect, and not a very bad one. His conscious enjoyment, his easy-flowing and his high-toned treatment of the language of the language, was approved by the Declarer of Independence.

The tone of refined speech, from the language of the language, was against everyone excepting the language. The "prime truth of slang-stingers" is that the language is all right, but not with a total frankness for property. Slang Winchell is expressed in terms of the language of the language, and, in the concluding discussion of Winchell's English:

When Walter Winchell tells of a man-married couple who have come to Arizona to "beneath," Professor Tunstall added, "the most popular per, which could be somewhat of the highest."

The English language has been subjected to many variations in the past, said Professor Curtin Brown of New York University, where the Modern Language Association of America, and one has shown remarkable toughness and power of persistence. The whole opinion is that it will continue without any perceptible effect from the present words, but much has to go to it.

"Dreadfully these intellectual fads lead to quicken our national speech," remarked Professor R. B. Allen, head of the Department of English and History at the University of Arizona, where most of the words in this region have been abandoned by the "most popular per, which could be somewhat of the highest."

"The whole opinion is that it will continue without any perceptible effect from the present words, but much has to go to it.

The annual intercollegiate track meet is tentatively scheduled for the first week in April.

The rule was already on the books in a modified form. "The further action taken by the committee on the problem, however, seems to indicate that there may be some effort to enforce the rule from now on," he said.

"Whether the new rules will effect the benefits for which they were designed is a question," Sanford said, "and all my sympathy is with those officials who have to enforce them."

The rule, as it had developed, was almost a complete abandonment of the principle of giving aid to fallen runners. "And I trust, said Sanford, "that the committee will see to it that the high school officials will be notified of the changes in the rules."

THE ART OF "BULLFESTING"

Dear to the hearts of all college students, whether they are connected with any organized groups or not, is the pastime of “bulliesting.” Enlightening and fun, it is coming from the Oregon State Daily Barometer. It is printed below in full text and shows what other students think of this ancient art, prevalent on every campus.

"Perhaps the oldest of all college institutions is bulliesting. From time immemorial, gatherings through the world have sponsored bulliush. It seems to thrive and grow better in this atmosphere than that of any other. There is something to its appeal. There are few who do not desire to attend class, except for their final examinations. Tutions are abated, but certain fees are exacted for every course carried, regardless of the number of hours which are attended. There are no master.-of this art, but its followers have developed it, and the condition which gives the participants more of an opportunity for concentrated study. It is an art with some students who have natural faculties for it, but others it must be developed. It takes practice to become proficient in this.

The universities of Prague and Berlin give the students such freedom of study in order to attend class except for their final examinations. Tutions are abated, but certain fees are exacted for every course carried, regardless of the number of hours which are attended. There are no master.-of this art, but its followers have developed it, and the condition which gives the participants more of an opportunity for concentrated study.
