McDempsey gives Trail Reporter Exclusive Interview; Advises College Men To Take Up Boxing or Wrestling

By Horrie Clifford

"All college men should take up boxing or wrestling or baseball if he is the kind of self defense," is the opinion of Jack McDempsey, former world's heavyweight boxing champion and one of the greatest figures in sports today.

In an exclusive interview granted the Trail sports column, he referred to the question of what college men should know how to box or wrestle, for things with them have been and are at present the best methods of self defense. He said he will never stand on the street, and if knows anything about boxing or wrestling he will be able to protect himself.

Condition Important

Some may say that boxing is dangerous. The Ma one keeps himself in condition in there is little danger of serious injury in amateur boxing or wrestling, but he goes on to state that one should never take part in these sports unless in good condition.

As to keeping in condition, McDempsey says, "A person, while in training, should eat wholesome food and get plenty of sleep and lay off drinking. As a matter of fact smoking and drinking don't anyone any good. They are best left alone."
